Masterclass in Joint Replacement

Over the years, Joint Replacement has become more common. This may have been because of the advances in technology, the increase in obesity rates during the past decade and the aging of the population. One important factor is thought to be expanding of indications to younger patients and the number of patients living longer with knee replacements continues to increase. Moreover, people nowadays have come to expect a certain type of life and they want to be able to keep up their lifestyle in spite of the demands it may make upon their body.

With more and more patients in need of well-functioning joint replacement, the field is rising to the challenge of providing long-lasting, functional, pain-free replacements. Progress in this area is dependent on the development of improved methods of patient evaluation and selection for surgery, effective dissemination of new knowledge, and the clinical investigation of refined and new arthroscopic interventions. This is a unique challenge for the orthopaedic surgeon as the patient presents himself with joint symptoms that originate from a wide range of disease processes, and the patient age range spans from adolescence through young age.
